7. Law. Applied to a jury.

In 12-14th c. a jury was a body of witnesses summoned to decide by their sworn testimony (oerdictum, verdict) some question debated between litigants who had formally agreed to be bound by that testimony. The jury being summoned from the neighbourhood (hundred) in which the controverted facts were supposed to have taken place, the question was said to be tried by the neighbourhood (L. vicinetum, visinetum, Fr. visnet) or by the 'country' (L. patria, F. pays). The litigants were said to put themselves upon the, or their country, and trial by the country was distinguished from other modes of trial. The phrase has been retained to the present day, when accused criminals still formally submit to trial 'by God and their country', although the character of trial by jury has been greatly changed. (F. W. Maitland.)

companionship,' subsequently 'an escort or retinue'; when comes became a designation of a state officer, comitatus followed as the name of his office, and when the count became a territorial lord, the comité became his territory—the stage at which the word entered English.]

2. One of the territorial divisions of Great Britain and Ireland, formed as the result of a variety of historical events, and serving as the most important divisional unit in the country for administrative, judicial, and political purposes.

The AF. comitatus and the med.L. comitatus were used to render the English SHIRE, the division of the country administered originally by an eorl and later by a sheriff (AF. viscount); whence countie was gradually adopted in English (app. scarcely before the 15th c.), as an alternative name for the shire, and in course of time was applied to the similar divisions made in Wales and in Ireland, as well as to the shires of Scotland, and also extended to those separate portions of the realm which never were shires, as the duchy of Cornwall, Orkney and Shetland, etc.

b. The status of county was also given at various times to a number of cities and towns in England and Ireland, with a certain portion of adjoining territory; these were separated from the shire in which they were situated, and made counties by themselves; more exactly called corporate counties or counties corporate: see CORPORATE ppl. a. 4.

c. By the Local Government Act of 1888 the word has received a further modification of meaning; besides the historical counties, and counties corporate, boroughs of above 50,000 inhabitants are made administrative counties under the name of county boroughs, which are administratively, but not politically or judicially, independent of the counties in which they are situated.

c. A section or subdivision of the area of an Exhibition building, a museum, or the like, open above (to the general roof), and usually devoted to the products of a particular country, or department of science, art, or industry.

This application of the word appears to have originated in the structure of the building in Hyde Park for the Great Exhibition of 1851. The rows of pillars supporting the roof, which crossed each other at right angles, divided the central area into a number of rectangular sections; these being themselves open to the lofty roof, while bordered on two sides by galleries supported by the pillars, suggested courts within buildings, and soon received the name; the term was further extended in the Crystal Palace at Sydenham (as in the Alhambra, Egyptian, Pompeian, and Renaissance Courts), and in later Exhibitions has been used with still greater extension; it has also been, with more closeness to the original notion, applied to the central open area of a museum, surrounded by its arcades and galleries.

1851 Illustr. Lond. News 3 May 364/1 The very nature of the construction of the building suggests its subdivision into courts; and this is distinctly illustrated in the plan of the gallery... there are four of these large courts, and two smaller ones, parallel with the transept in each of these western divisions of the Building... from the gallery these courts form a most interesting feature in the arrangements. Ibid. 31 May 494 The Tunis Court. Ibid. 495 The Canadian Court... II. A princely residence, household, retinue.

5. The place where a sovereign (or other high dignitary) resides and holds state, attended by his retinue.

This sense is said to have arisen in Old French, the name court being applied to the residences of the early Frankish kings on their rural domains: see Littré, and cf. sense 2. But the actual history is involved in obscurity from the paucity of early evidence.

The early history of this distinction is obscure. F. W. Maitland.)

[app. an early ME. repr. of an OE. cūp utlaga known outlaw.] A term applied, according to Bracton, to a person knowingly harbouring or concealing an outlaw; or perhaps, more properly, to the offence of doing so.

c 1250 BRACTON iii. ii. xlii. (Rolls) II. 336 Talem [exulem] vocant Anglice utlaghe. [Utlagatus] aut potest esse notus et cognitus vel ignotus et incognitus; et unde qui notum et cognitum receptaverit par poena puniendus est, qui dicitur Couthutlaughe [MSS. v. rr.: see above]. 1607 COWELL

Interpr. Couthutlaughe is he that willingly receiveth a man outlawed... and hideth him. [Hence, 1641 in Termes de la Ley, 1666 BLOUNT, and later Dicts.]

[Known only in loc. cit.; the OE. term represented is not recorded. It is not easy to comprehend that the term 'known outlaw' could originally designate the harbourer; prob. the word is the fragment of a phrase designating the harbouring of a known outlaw; it has been suggested that the meaning might be 'acquaintance or familiar of an outlaw', but this would be in OE. utlaga cūpa, or perh. cūpa utlaga.]

|| Couvade (kuv'vād). [a. obs. F. couvade; f. couver to hatch: see next. Cotgr. (1611) has couvade = couvée (COVEY) or couverment (brooding, sitting on eggs); whence the derivative phrase, faire la couvade 'to sit cowering or skowking within doors, to lurk in the campe when Gallants are at the Battell'.] A term applied by some writers to the 'man-childbed' attributed to some uncivilized or primitive races, and extended to comprehend a series of customs according to which, on the birth of a child, the father performs acts or simulates states natural or proper to the mother, or abstains for a time from certain foods or actions, as if he were physically affected by the birth.

1861 TYLOR Early Hist. Man. x. 288 One of these practices has an existing European name, the couvade, or 'hatching'; and this term it may be convenient to use for the whole set. Ibid. x. 294 The country... where Marco Polo met with the practice of the couvade in the thirteenth century, appears to be the Chinese province of West Yunnan. 1871 YULE Marco Polo Note 3 to ii. 1. 57 This highly eccentric practice has been ably illustrated and explained by Mr. Tylor under the name of the Couvade or Hatching, by which it is known in some of the Béarn districts of the Pyrenees.

[Fr. couvade (in R. Etienne 1543, Ph. Monet 1626) was a word of the same class as croisade CRUSADE, in which the suffix -ade, adapted from Pr. and Sp. -ada, It. -ada, -ata, is substituted for the cognate F. -de, from L. -ata: see -ADE. It was thus etymologically a doublet of covade, covey. As applied to men the phrase faire la couvade appears to have been merely derivative. The recent application of the word in anthropology is due to Dr. E. B. Tylor, following M. Francisque Michel Le Pays Basque (1857) 201, where the 'man-childbed' attributed to the Basques and Béarnese, is said to be so called by the latter. But this is a mistake, traceable to a statement as to the phrase faire la couvade, in Rochefort's Hist. Naturelle et Morale des Antilles (1658) 494-5, repeated with variations by a sequence of later writers. It is not true that couvade was ever a name for the practice in Béarn; the Béarnese covade is simply = F. covade, a covey of chickens. Further, the pretended existence of the practice in Béarn and among the Basques appears to be merely the echo of a statement of Strabo as to the ancient Celtiberians, loosely repeated by one compiler after another as a commonplace of history. (See Academy 29 Oct., 5 and 19 Nov., 10 and 17 Dec. 1892.)]

In the 1556 ed. of Bracton, erroneously printed cove and key; repeated in Spelman and the Law Dicts., as well as in the Rolls ed. of Bracton. The MSS. have clearly cove; MS. Rawlinson C. 158 has cieve and key (see CREVE 2 chamber, bed-room; closet = cove). MS. Rawl. C. 159 has cōfre, app. altered from cōfa. See W. H. Stevenson in Academy, 17 May 1890, 338. (It is not perfectly clear whether cove, cieve closet here meant 'bed-chamber' or 'store-chamber'.)

[The early variant cōfe has suggested that this is identical with Sc. Coffe sb., 'chapman, pedlar', the sense having undergone the same transition as in CHAP, which is now nearly equivalent in meaning, save that cove belongs to a lower and more slangy stratum of speech. But the phonetic change of f to v, at so late a date, is not usual; and the origin of the word still remains obscure. [The Heb. word בְּרִית berith is also the ordinary term for a contract, agreement, alliance, or league between men. It is constantly rendered in the Septuagint by διαθήκη 'disposition, distribution, arrangement', which occurs in Aristophanes in the sense 'convention, arrangement between parties', but usually in cl. Gr. meant 'disposition by will, testament'. Accordingly, the Old Latin translation of the Bible (Itala) appears to have uniformly rendered διαθήκη by testamentum, while Jerome translated the Heb. by fœdus and pactum indifferently. Hence, in the Vulgate, the O. T. has the old rendering testamentum in the (Gallican) Psalter, but Jerome's renderings fœdus, pactum elsewhere; the N. T. has always testamentum. In English Wyclif strictly followed the Vulgate, rendering fœdus, pactum, by boond, covenantz, rather indiscriminately, testamentum in the Psalter and N. T. always by testament. So the versions of Rheims and Douay. The 16th c. English versions at length used covenant entirely in O. T. (including the Psalter), and Tindale introduced it into 6 places in the N. T. These the Geneva extended to 23, and the Bible of 1611 to 22 (in 2 of which Gen. had testament), leaving testament in 14 (in 3 of which Gen. had covenant). The Revised Version of 1881 has substituted covenant in 12 of these, leaving testament in 2 only (Heb. ix. 16, 17).]

Thus בְּרִית, διαθήκη, fœdus (pactum), covenant are applied to God's engagement with Noah and his posterity, Gen. vi. 18, ix. 9-17; to that made with Abraham and his posterity, Gen. xvii, of which the token was circumcision; to the institution of the Mosaic Law, Exod. xxiv. 7, 8, and to that law or its observance itself, whence the expressions book of the covenant (i.e. of the law), ark of the covenant, blood of the covenant (i.e. of beasts ritually sacrificed), land of the covenant (=promised land, Canaan). The covenant with the Israelites, in its various phases, is commonly called the Old Covenant, in contrast to which the prophets made promise of a new covenant, Jer. xxxi. 31; and this name καὶνὴ διαθήκη New Covenant (testament) was, according to St. Luke xxii. 20, applied by Jesus to the new relation to man which God had established in Him. In this sense it is also used by St. Paul and the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, who contrast these two covenants (Gal. iv. 24, Heb. viii. 13, ix. 15, etc.), also called by commentators the Temporal and the Eternal Covenant (cf. Heb. xiii. 20).

8. Theol. a. Covenant of Works, Covenant of Grace: the two relations which are represented as subsisting between God and man, before and since the Fall.

The Covenant of Works (or of Life) was made with Adam for himself and his posterity upon condition of obedience; the Covenant of Grace (or of Redemption) with 'the Second Adam' and with his elect in him, for their deliverance from the misery and penalty into which they had fallen through transgression of the covenant of works. The theology of the covenants, or Federal Theology, was first elaborated by Koch or Cocceius (1603-1669); and attained great vogue in the 17th c., esp. among the Puritans. It is prominently developed in the Westminster Confession of Faith, and its accompanying Catechisms.

9. Ecol. a. Sc. Hist. The name given to certain bonds of agreement signed by the Scottish Presbyterians for the defence and furtherance of their religion and ecclesiastical polity.

The National Covenant was signed at Edinburgh on 28 Feb. 1638 for the defence of Presbyterianism against the Episcopal system that had been introduced by James I and Charles I. The Solemn League and Covenant was accepted by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland on 17 Aug. 1643, and by the Westminster Assembly of Divines, and English Parliament, on 25 Sept., as a league between England and Scotland on the basis of the establishment of Presbyterianism in both countries. It is to the latter especially that the name usually refers. It is sometimes given also to the Bonds subscribed at Edinburgh by the Lords of the Congregation and their followers on 3 Dec. 1557, and at Perth on 31 May 1559, the object of which was the carrying out of the Protestant Reformation.

[A Common Teut. and Common Indo-germanic word: OE. cū = OFris. kū, OS. cū (MDu. koe, Du. koe, LG. ko), OHG. chuo (MSH. kūo, G. kūh), Icel. kýr, acc. and dat. kú (= kú-a, Sw., Da. ko, kø) = OTeut. **kōu-s*, **kō-s*, fem. = Aryan gʷōus, acc. gʷōni, whence Skr. gāvis, gāni, gaw, gō, Gr. βοῦς, βο-, βο-, L. bōs, bou-, bo-, ox; the word being of both genders outside Teutonic.

The ū in OE, Fris., and ON, against the original ō retained in OS. and OHG., is perh. to be explained from an original Teutonic inflexion kō(u)s, kōni, kōwes, kōui, pl. kōwes, kōwōni, kō(u)nis, whence, by regular passage of original ōu before vowels into ū, gen. kūis, dat. kūi, pl. kūis, etc. Hence by levelling in the separate langs., kō or kā (umlaut ky), throughout. (Prof. Sievers.)

The OE. inflexion was: Sing. gen. cūe, cū, later, after o-stems, cuus, cūs; dat. cū; Pl. nom. acc. cye, cū, gen. cūa, later, after n-stems, cūna, north. cūna; dat. cūum. Eng. But Southern Eng. at an early period took an extended form kyn, later kyne, kine, still used, with slightly archaic flavour, beside the later cows, which hardly appears before the 17th c. ME. kyn is to be compared with brethren, children, and other southern plurals in -n. In this particular case, the use of the gen. pl. cūna, cūna (in 12th c. cume, kyne) with numerals (see 1 b below), may have contributed to the prevalence of the kyn, kyne form.]

The precise reference to tail is uncertain: it may be to an animal 'turning tail' in flight, or to the habit in frightened animals of drawing the tail between the hinder legs: cf. the Heraldic use in sense B 2. It is notable that in the Old French version of Reynard the Fox, Coart is the name of the hare: this may be a descriptive appellation in reference to its timidity; but it is also possible that the hare was so called originally from its tail or 'bunt', so conspicuous as the animal makes off, and that the name was thence transferred to 'hearts of hare'.

The history of cufle and its allied forms is obscure.]

1. A garment with a hood (vestis capitiata), worn by monks, varying in length in different ages and according to the usages of different orders, but 'having the permanent characteristics of covering the head and shoulders, and being without sleeves' (Cath. Dict.). † Also, formerly, a cloak or frock worn by laymen or by women.

The cl. Lat. cucullus was the hood of a cloak, covering the head only. The cowls of the early Egyptian monks covered the heads, and barely reached the shoulders; by 800 the cowls of monks had become so long as to reach their heels, when St. Benedict restricted their length to two cubits. In the 14th c. the cowl and the frock were often confounded; but it was declared at the Council of Vienne 'we understand by the name of cuculla a habit long and full, but not having sleeves, and by that of stoculus a long habit which has long and wide sleeves'. See Du Cange s.v. Cuculla.

The earliest trace of the word appears to be in the derivative cozoner in Awdelay's Fraternite of Vacabondes, 1561 (see COZEN); it is not improbable that it arose among the vagabond class. It has generally been associated with COUSIN sb., and compared with F. coisiner, explained by Cotgrave, 1611, as 'to clayne kindred for advantage, or particular ends; as he, who to saue charges in traueiling, goes from house to house, as cousin to the owner of euerie one', by Littré as 'faire le parasite sous prétexte de cousinage'. From this it is not far to a transitive sense 'to cheat, beguile, under pretext of cousinship': cf. also the phrase 'to make a cousin of' under COUSIN 8. Still, the transition is not evidenced in our quotations for this vb.; and it is noteworthy that while in cousin sb. the ending -in predominates, this verb has sometimes -on, most commonly -en, the prevalent 17th. c. forms being coosen, cousen, cozen, cozen, the latter of which became the established form c 1710. In view of these difficulties, Mr. Smythe Palmer has suggested derivation from It. cozzonare, explained by Florio 1598-1611 as 'to play the horse-breaker or courser' . . . Also, to play the craftie knave', deriv. of cozzone, 'a horse-breaker . . . a horse-courser. Also, a craftie knave'. But this also presents difficulties, which the extant evidence is not sufficient to remove.]

1. The common name for decapod crustaceans animals of the tribe Brachyura; applied especially to the edible species found on or near the sea coast in most regions of the world. Also with qualifications applied to other Crustacea and Arachnida which more or less resemble these.

The common edible crab of Britain and Europe is Cancer pagurus; the small green, or shore crab is Carcinus Maenas; the edible or blue crab of the United States is Callinectes hastatus. Other genera of Brachyura are known as box-crab, calling-crab, fiddler-crab, lady-crab, land-crab, pea-crab, porcelain-crab, rock-crab, sand-crab, spider-crab, stone-crab, swimming-crab, etc. Black crab, a land-crab of the Antilles, Gecarcinus ruricola, so called from the marking of its carapace. The hermit-crab, Pilodius, soldier-crab, tree-crab, belong to the tribe Anomura. The horse-shoe, Molucca, or king-crab is classed among the Arachnida. Glass-crabs are young transparent crustaceans of the families Piloduridae and Scyllaridae. Crabs can move in any direction, and frequently walk sideways or backwards, to which characteristic frequent reference is made in language: cf. crab-like, crab-sidle, also CRABBED.

9. pl. slang. The lowest throw at hazard, two aces. To come off, turn out crabs: to turn out a failure or disappointment. [This may belong to CRAB sb. 2]

1768 LD. CARLISLE in Jesse G. Sekwyn (1882) II. 238 (Farmer) If you . . will play, the best thing I can wish you is, that you may win and never throw crabs. 1779 GAMBLERS 7 Then Hazard rose, and Crabs and Doctors sprang. 1801 Sporting Mag. XVII. 7 Dreamt that I had thrown crabs all night, and could not rest seven for the life of me. 1862 WYATT MELVILLE Tilbury Nags 51 My next neighbour . . called for fresh dice, and selected two of them with the utmost care only to throw 'crabs'. 1874 G. A. LAWRENCE Hagarene iii (Farmer), My annuity drops with me; and if this throw comes off crabs, there won't be enough to bury me, unless I die a defaulter.

10. Rowing. To catch (rarely cut) a crab: to make a faulty stroke in rowing whereby the oar becomes jammed under water. The resistance of the water against the blade dives the handle against the rower's body with sufficient force (if the boat be in rapid motion) to throw him back out of his seat, and to endanger the capsizing of the boat.

The phrase prob. originated in the humorous suggestion that the rower had caught a crab, which was holding his oar down under water; it does not appear to have any historical connexion with the It. pigliare un granchio 'to catch a crab', to make a big blunder or complete mistake, 'toto calo errare'; all the quotes, given by Manzoni for this phrase are fig., of conduct, action, etc., e.g. 'In nessun'altra cosa l'uomo più erra, piglia più granchi, e fa maggior marraioni, che nella cosa della guerra' (i.e. In no other thing does man err more, catch more crabs, and make greater blunders (lit. spades), than in the matter of war).

The phrase is not uncommonly applied, from similarity of result, to the action of missing the water with the stroke, or to any other action which causes the rower to fall backward; but this (though found in Dictionaries from Grose onward) is an improper use by the uninitiated.

1785 Grose Dict. Vulgar Tongue s.v. Crab, To catch a crab, to fall backwards by missing one's stroke in rowing. 1804 Sporting Mag. XLIII. 262 Catching crabs, that is, missing the hold they intend to take of the water with their oars. 1806 *Specif. C. When laying on your oars under sail, what should be done with them? A. Always fling them out of the rowlocks, and let them rest afloat in the gunwale. If they are left in the rowlocks, and the loom of the oar were not kept...down, it would 'catch a crab'. 1867 SMYTH Sailor's Word-book, Catch a crab, in rowing, when an oar gets so far beneath the surface of the water, that the rower cannot recover it in time to prevent his being knocked backwards. 1880 Times 27 Sept. 11/3 A boat upset...because one of the rowers caught a 'crab'.

Crab (kræb), sb.<sup>2</sup> Also 5-7 crabbe; 6- SCRAP. [Of uncertain origin, appearing first in 15th c.

A Sc. form scrab, scrabbe, is evidenced from beg. of 16th c., and may easily be much older. This is app. from Norse, as Rietz has Sw. dial. skrabb fruit of the wild apple-tree, and may be the original form. In that case crabbe, crab, would be a southern perversion, assimilated to CRAB sb.<sup>1</sup> But, on the other hand, this may be only a transferred use of that word: cf. the history and development of CRABBED, and the application of crab in various languages to a person. A fruit externally promising, but so crabbed and ill-conditioned in quality, might very naturally be so called; yet actual evidence of the connexion is wanting. (A Sw. krabb, apple, which has been cited, is merely the horticultural name of the American Crab-apple, Pyrus coronaria, introduced with the shrub from the United States.)

Crabbed (kræbéd), a. Also 4 crabyt, 4-6 crabbid, 4-8 -it, 5 -yd, (Sc. 6-7 crabbit, 6 crabbit). [orig. f. CRAB sb.<sup>1</sup> + -ED: cf. DOGGED.] The primary reference was to the crooked or wayward gait of the crustacean, and the contradictory, perverse, and fractious disposition which this expressed. Cf. Ger. krabbe crab, whence, according to Grimm, 'because these animals are malicious and do not easily let go what they have seized, LG. ene lutje krabbe (a little crab) a little quarrelsome ill-conditioned man (Bremen Wbch.)'; also in Saxony said of self-willed, refractory children. So E.Fris. krabbe crab, transf. a cantankerous, cross-grained man (who is refractory and fioward like a crab, sticking fast or going backwards, when he ought to advance); whence krabbig contentious, cantankerous, fractious, cross-grained (Doomkaat Koolman). Literal senses of 'cross-grained, crooked', and 'knotted, gnarled, un-smooth', applied to sticks, trees, and the like, also appear; these re-act upon the sense in which the word is applied to persons and their dispositions. In later use there is association with the fruit, giving the notion of 'sour-tempered, morose, peevish, harsh'.]

A secondary object is to give the cloth a particular finish, so that the operation is now frequently used for all-wool and all-cotton cloth.

-cratie (-krasie), ad. med.L. -cratia, a. Gr. -κρατία, in composition 'power, rule', f. κράτος strength, might, rule, authority. Already used in Greek in δημοκρατία aristocracy, rule of the best-born, δημοκρατία democracy, popular government, δημοκρατία ochlocracy, mob-rule, πλουτοκρατία plutocracy, an oligarchy of wealth, θεοκρατία theocracy, rule of God; whence ANGELOCRACY, government by angels, bestocracy (The Times 21 Nov. 1863) the rule of beasts. All these have a preceding o belonging to or representing the stem vowel of the first element, but which tends to be viewed as part of the suffix, as if this were -ocracy. The word aristocracy has in modern times, in Fr. and Eng., passed into the senses of 'a ruling body of nobles, the nobles as a ruling class, political power, or upper class', after which democracy has received the sense of 'the people or lower class as a political power or element', and plutocracy that of 'a class ruling or influential by virtue of its wealth'.

Hence the suffix, in the form -ocracy, has been added to English words, to designate in mockery or ridicule any dominant, superior, or aspiring class, as in the following (mostly colloquial or newspaper words): barristerocracy, brokerocracy, capocracy, millocracy, shipocracy, shoddyocracy (barristers, brokers, cap-setting women, mill-owners, ship-owners, shoddy-manufacturers, as classes of social standing or pretensions); see also BEEBROCRACY, CLUBBROCRACY, COTTONOCRACY, COUNTRYOCRACY, MODOCRACY, SNOBOCRACY, SHOPOCRACY, SNAWBOCRACY, etc.

† Cradden, on, sb. and a. Obs. exc. dial. Also 6-7 Sc. crau-, crawdown; 8-9 dial. craddant. [OE. cradol, beside which there was perh. a parallel form **cradel* whence northern ME. credil, credel, mod. Sc. and north. Eng. creddle. Derivation uncertain.]

Usually compared with OHG. chratio, cratio, MHG. kratie 'basket, panier, creel' which, with the synonymous OHG. chreazo, MHG. chreaze, kreize, Ger. kratze, kreise (having also, Grimm, Kratze I. 3, the sense 'cradle'), appears to go back to an ablaut-stem **krat-*, krad-. From this, OE. cradol, cradel might be a diminutive formation, lit. 'little basket': cf. mod. bassinet.

The various Celtic derivations conjectured, e.g. from Welsh crŷd, 'shake, shakes, ague', now also in N Wales 'cradle', from Gael. creathall (kre'al), cradle, etc., have no etymological value. Craddhal sometimes erroneously cited as Irish, is a bad spelling of Gael. creathall, given by O'Reilly from Shaw.]

V. Applied to boats, ships, and fishing requisites.

[These uses were probably colloquial with watermen, fishers, and seamen some time before they appeared in print, so that the history is not evidenced; but the expression is probably elliptical, sense g being = vessels of small craft, i.e. small trading vessels, or of small seaman's art, and sense ro = requisites of the fisherman's art. It is not impossible that the latter was the earlier: cf. quot. 1704 in ro. The want in English of any general collective term for all sorts of 'vessels for water carriage' naturally made craft a useful stop-gap.]

The relations of the Celtic words themselves are obscure. W. craig is not the corresponding form to Ir. and Gael. crag, which would require crech in Welsh. W. has also carraig, OW. carraig, a stone (sometimes also, a rock), Irish carraig, OL. carraig, rocky, rocky headland, anglicized carrick.]

The WGer. type is **krago*; but the non-appearance of the word in the earlier stages of the languages is notable. The general opinion of etymologists also is that the Norse and Scandinavian words are from German, since they show only the secondary sense 'collar'; in that case our word is prob. from some Low German source: no OE, **craga* is recorded, and if it existed, it could only give CRAQ v. v.]

Cran 1 (kræn). Sc. [Of uncertain etymology : cran is used in Gaelic in same sense, and it has been suggested that it is the Gaelic cran 'lot', and was applied orig. to the 'lot' or share of fish that fell to each man engaged.] A measure of capacity for fresh herrings as caught; fixed by the Fisheries Board at 37½ gallons (about 750 fish).

Up to 1815 the cran was measured by heaping full a herring-barrel with the ends taken out, which was then lifted, leaving the heap on the ground or floor. In 1816, the Commissioners for the Herring Fishery fixed the capacity of the 'cran' at 42 gallons, Old Wine Measure, which in 1832 was raised to 45 gallons, 42 gallons when 'pined' being found insufficient to make a barrel of bung-packed herrings. In 1852 the contents were given in Imperial measure as 37½ gals., making, when pined, a barrel of 30 gals.

1. The fruit of a dwarf shrub, Vaccinium Oxyccoccus, a native of Britain, Northern Europe, Siberia, and N. America, growing in turf boggs : a small, roundish, dark red, very acid berry. Also the similar but larger fruit of V. macrocarpon, a native of N. America (Large or American Cranberry). Both are used for tarts, preserves, etc. The name is also given to the shrubs themselves.

The name appears to have been adopted by the North American colonists from some I.G. source, and brought to England with the American cranberries (V. macrocarpon), imported already in 1686, when Ray (Hist. Pl. 685) says of them 'hujus baccae a Nova Anglia usque missas Londini vidimus et gustavimus. Scribitis seu ortis (Nort's nostrates vocant) eas inferciunt'. Thence it began to be applied in the 18th c. to the British species (V. Oxyccoccus). In some parts, where the latter is unknown, the name is erroneously given to the cowberry (V. Vitis Idæa).

1. A large grallatorial bird of the family Gruidae, characterized by very long legs, neck, and bill. The name belongs originally to the common European crane, Gruis cinerea, of an ashy-gray colour, formerly abundant in marshy places in Great Britain, and prized as food, but now extinct; about 15 closely-allied species are found in other lands.

Among these are the common American or Sand-hill Crane (G. canadensis), and Whooping Crane (G. americana). The Crown Crane or Demoiselle, Numidian, and Stanley Crane of Africa belong to allied genera. The Adjutant or Gigantic Crane is a species of Stork.

1. A thin transparent gauze-like fabric, plain woven, without any twill, of highly twisted raw silk or other staple, and mechanically embossed, so as to have a crisped or minutely wrinkled surface. The name originally comprised fine worsted fabrics (see b.); but it is now chiefly limited to a black silk (or imitation silk) fabric much used for ladies' mourning dresses, and for funeral trimming and draping.

Sometimes specifically called English crape (crêpe anglais). For similar fabrics of other colours or material the French form Crêpe (which has retained the wider meaning of the word) is now used by preference, though the English form also occurs with qualifications, as in Canton or China crape = crêpe de Chine, crêpe-lesse = Crêpe lisse, a kind of crape without any wrinkling or 'figure'; see also crêpe-cloth below. The 'crape' for which Norwich was formerly famous, was a plain cloth of silk warp and worsted weft, which afterwards degenerated into bombastine: see the latter word (quots. 1789-1832).

Cranch, cranch (krānʃ, krānʃ), v. [Cranch appears after 1600; in early use it varied with scranch, still given by JOHNSON, 1755, as retained by the Scots, and now dialectal. As in other words where initial cr- and scr- interchange (cf. crab, scrab, crap, scrab, cratch, scratch), it is doubtful which of these is the original. The priority of scranch is favoured by its nearness in form and sense to some Du. and LG. words. Cf. 16th c. Du., in Plantijn 1573, schransen to split, break, evidently related to MHG. schrans breach, split, crack, rent; in Kilian 1599 schransen to break, tear, crush, bruise; also to chew, crush with the teeth, to comminute or grind (the food) with the teeth; mod. Du. schransen to eat voraciously, WFLem. schransen to gnash, eat with gnashing of the teeth, to crunch; also EFris. schransen, schransen, to tear or snatch to oneself, to eat greedily.

On the other hand, earlier examples are at present known of cranch, and this may, as in the parallel pair crunch, scrunch, be really the earlier form. Cranch might be an onomatopoeic modification of crash, which was used in the very same sense from 16th to 18th c.: see quot. 1730 from Bailey's Folio. That association with crash, crush, has affected the word, is evidenced by the later form crunch. The original pronunciation was as in branch; the occasional pronunciation as in crunch is due to the spelling with au (chiefly since JOHNSON), with the obsolescence of the word in living use: cf. Thoreau's spelling crunch.]

1. An article of dress worn round the neck, chiefly by men.

It came into vogue in France in the 17th c. in imitation of the linen scarf worn round their necks by the Croatian mercenaries. When first introduced it was of lace or linen, or of muslin edged with lace, and tied in a bow with long flowing ends, and much attention was bestowed upon it as an ornamental accessory. In this form it was originally also worn by women. More recently the name was given to a linen or silk handkerchief passed once (or twice) round the neck outside the shirt collar and tied with a bow in front; also to a long woollen 'comforter' wrapped round the neck to protect from cold out of doors.

1865 BLOUNT Glossogr., Crabats (Fr.)... is often used Substantively for a new fashioned Gorget which women wear [1674 (ed. 4) Crabat (Fr.) is of late well known with us to be that Linen which is worn about Mens (especially Soldiers and Travellers) Necks, in stead of a Band]. 1668 Wit Restored, Burs of Reform. (Fairholt), Pray you Madam

Mr. Henry Nicol (Proc. Phil. Soc., Dec. 1879) suggested its identification with OF. crauanté, crauanté, crushed, overcome: see CRAVENT v. But the total absence of the final e from the word, at a date when English still retained final e, makes a difficulty. Others have considered it a variant, in some way, of CREANT (OF. creant, crauit), which is a much more frequent word in the same sense in ME. The difficulty here is to account for the v (or u), for which popular association with CRAVE v. and its northern pa. pples. craued has been conjectured.]

Da. and Norw. kraule to crawl, climb up, Sw. krafta to grope, Icel. krafta to paw or scabble with the hands (mod. Icel. krafta fram ir to crawl out of). The word existed also in West Germanic, but the corresponding OE. form **craflan* has not been found.

To Norse krafta corresponds an OLG. **krabablu*, whence 15th c. HG. krablen, krablu to crawl, creep, still used in various HG. dialects, but now replaced in mod.G. by krabbeln (see Kluge). The word is a frequentative from an OTEut. vb. stem **krab-*: krab- to scratch, claw, paw: cf. CRAB v. 2 and see Grimm krabbeln, krabbeln.

The diphthongal ME craule, crawle (from craule), was reduced to craul by end of 15th c., riming with small in Spenser: cf. the form-history of awl. But the phonology of the early forms craule, creule, craule, is obscure; craule reminds us of MDu. craelen, but craule, crule, suggests some confusion with CROWN, Fr. crouler: see esp. sense 6.]

[Three types of this are found, viz. (1) crike, cryke (F), usual in ME., (2) creke, rare in ME. (see sense 7), but common in the 16th c. (whence the current creek), and (3) criek, only since 16th c. The first corresponds to F. crique (14th c. in Littré); the second to earlier Du. krēke (Kilian), mod. Du. kreech creek, bay, and to med. (Anglo) L. creca (sometimes crecca) creek. The form criek resembles Sw. dial. krik bend, nook, corner, creek, cove (Rietz), and Icel. kriki crack, nook (handarkriki armpit), but is prob. an Eng. shortening of crique, crike. In many parts of U.S. crik is the common pronunciation of creek in the sense 'stream'. The earlier history is not known, but the word (in French also) is generally supposed to be Germanic. In sense 4 the word appears to be related to crack; in 6 and 7 there appears to be association with CROOK.

A corresponding double form is seen in pike, peak, F. pic. It has been conjectured that the word is preserved in the OE. proper names Creacanford, Creaganford, Creagford, Crayford (in Kent), and Creca-geld, Cricelad, Flor. Cricelade, Cricelade (in Wilts); the former is impossible; in the latter Creca could not be the origin of either crike or creke, though some connexion is possible, if there were any reason to suppose that the meaning suits.]

b. In U.S. and British Colonies: A branch of a main river, a tributary river; a rivulet, brook, small stream, or run.

Probably the name was originally given by the explorers of a river to the various inlets or arms observed to run out of it, and of which only the mouths were seen in passing; when at a later period these 'creeks' were explored, they were often found to be tributaries of great length; but they retained the designation originally given, and 'creek' thus received an application entirely unknown in Great Britain.

2. Spinning. A frame for holding the paying-off bobbins in the process of converting the 'sliver' into 'roving', or the latter into yarn. Hence also creel-frame.

Creem (krīm), v. dial. Also cream, crim. [Of obscure etymology: possibly two or even three distinct words are here included. The various senses belong to distinct parts of England.]

The variant crim has suggested identity with OE. criman to squeeze, press (cf. sense 2); but the evidence does not show that crim is the earlier form, rather the contrary: and it is not easy to see how cream with its long vowel could arise from the ablaut series krīm, krān, krum.

1. trans. To put, place, or deposit secretly or surreptitiously. (northern.)

1674 RAY N. C. Words 12 Creem it into my hand: Put it in silyly or secretly. Chesh. a 1700 B. E. *Dict. Creengle, obs. f. CRINGLE.

Creep (krīp), v. Pa. t. and pa. pple. crept (krept). Forms: see below. [A common Teutonic strong vb.: OE. creopan = OS. criopan, OFris. kriapa (Nfris. krepēn, Satl. kriape), ON. krjupa (Sw. krypa, Da. krybe):—O.Teut. **kreupan*. As with some other verbs of the same class (cf. Bow, Brook, Lout), the present has in some of the langs. i for eu, as OLG. krūpan, MDu. crūpen, Du. krūpen, MLG. and LG. and Efris. krūpen, MG. krīfen, krāufen. In OHG. replaced by chriohhan, MHG. and mod. Ger. krīchen, repr. a type kreukan, the relation of which to kreupan is uncertain.]

The O.Teut. conjugation was, pres. kreupan, pa. t. kraup, pl. krupun, pa. pple. krupan; whence OE. pies. criopan (3rd sing. criepp), pa. t. criap, pl. crupun, pa. pple. cropan. The OE. pres. criopan, M.E. crēpen (close e), has regularly given the modern creep; occasional M.E. instances of crope are app. errors. The pa. t. sing. criap regularly gave M.E. crēp (open e), spelt also crepe, crepe, which was in general use to the 15th c., and survives with short vowel in the dialectal crep. The plural crupen, crupen, became in the 13th c. cropen, crope, after the pa. pple.; and this passed also into the sing. as crope, the prevailing type of the tense to the 16th c., after which it gradually dropped out of literary use, though still widely used in English and U.S. dialects. In the northern dial., the form adopted in the 13th c. was crap (after the pa. t. of other classes), which is still Scotch. But already before 1400, weak forms creep-ed and creep-t, began to take the place of all these, the second of which has since 16th c. gradually attained to be the standard form, leaving crep, crope, crup, crap, as only dialectal. The pa. pple. cropan continued till the 17th c. in literary use, and to the 19th c. in the northern dial. where the vowel is still short croppen, cruppen; in the south it became in 13th c. crope, also literary Eng. to the 18th c.; but a weak form crepid, creeped began to appear in the 14th c., and in the form crept, identical with the pa. t., has been the dominant form since the 16th c.]

The history of this word is very obscure; L. crēna incision, notch, was formerly read in Pliny, *H. Cricket (kri'kət), sb. 2 Also 6 creakett, 7 krickett. [Etymology uncertain.]

The word occurs in a document of 1598 (see below), and the evidence then given takes the game back to the end of the reign of Henry VIII. The word appears to be the same as F. criquet given by Littre as 'jeu d'adresse', by Godefroy as 'bâton servant de but au jeu de boules', with a quot. of 1478, 'Le suppliant arriva en ung lieu ou on jouoit a la boulle, pres d'une atache [vine-stake] ou criquet'. It has been surmised that it is the same as CRICKET sb. 3, and the game a development of that known as STOOLE-BALL, to which there are many references from 1567 to 1725, as a game at which girls and women especially played; but this is very doubtful: cricket, a stool, is itself not in evidence till a later date. Cricket cannot be a deriv. of OE. crice 'knobbed staff', for here the cc was palatal and gave ME. crych, crutch, but F. criquet might be a deriv. of the cognate M.Flem. bricke, bricke, 'bâton à appuyer, quinette, potence'. Many changes have been made in the character of the game since the 17th c. when the bats were hockey-sticks, the wicket of two stumps with one long ball, and the ball trundled or 'bowled' along the ground. Cf. BAIL sb. 4, BAR sb. 2, BOWL v., WICKET.]

An open-air game played with ball, bats, and wickets, by two sides of eleven players each; the batsman defends his wicket against the ball, which is bowled by a player of the opposing side, the other players of this side being stationed about the 'field' in order to catch or stop the ball.

Cromlech (krōmlekh). Also 7 kromlech, 8-9 cromleah, 9 cromleasc. [a. Welsh cromlech (in Irish and Gael. cromleac, -leachd), f. crom, fem. of cruim 'crooked, bowed, bent, curved, concave, convex' + lech (flat) stone.]

A structure of prehistoric age consisting of a large flat or flatish unhewn stone resting horizontally on three or more stones set upright; found in various parts of the British Isles, esp. in Wales, Devonshire, Cornwall, and Ireland. Also applied to similar structures in other parts of the world.

This is the application of the word in Welsh. In Brittany such structures are called dolmen (= table-stones), while cromlech is the name of a circle of standing stones. As a common noun cromlech is known in Welsh only from c 1700, but as a proper name, or part of one, it occurs in Owen's Pembrokeshire, and in several place-names believed to be ancient. In Cornish it is known earlier; a grant in Bp. Grandison's Register at Exeter (1328-1370), purporting to be from Æthelstan to Buryan, 943 (Brich, Cartul. Sax. II.

In English there was a doublet form

CROCHON from Norman French. These words are quite distinct from L. crux CROSS, and its derivatives, with which they have never been confused in any Romance language: thus OF. croce and crois (crois), mod.F. croisse and croix, Pr. croza and croiz, OSp. croza and crus, It. croccia and croce, med.L. croccia and crux. In ME. also, croce was quite distinct from crois, croys, croysce; but after the Norse form of the latter word, crois, CROSS, prevailed, there was a tendency for croce and crois to run together as croisse, which resulted in the obsolescence of croce. (See copious examples by Rev. J. T. Fowler in Archæologia LII.)

Forms: 4-5 crocer, 4-7 croser, 5 crocere, croyscer, croysar, 5-6 croyscer, croisier, 6 croisair, croysier, croisier, -ear, (7 croisier), 6- croisier, 9 crozier. [Here two words appear to be confounded, the types of which were respectively OF. crocier, crosier, crosier 'qui porte la croisse', med.L. crociarius bearer of a crocia, 'croce', or 'crose', and F. croisier, L. type **cruciarius* one who bears or has to do with a cross (crux, croix). The Anglo-French and ME. forms of these were crocer or croser, and croisier, respectively; but the distinction was lost in the 15-16th c., when the words cross and crosse began to be confounded as croisse: see CROSS. In the 16th c. crosier's or crosier-staff was a common term for the episcopal crook, borne by the crociarius, and at length the crook itself was called the crosier. Many 19th c. ecclesiastical antiquaries have erroneously transferred the name to the cross borne before an archbishop.
